trate the historical progress of the science of shipbuilding, but in many cases have been directly the result of romantic or pathetic conditions in the past.

Among the most interesting examples should be noted the hull model built to a one-quarter inch seale for the British Admiralty. Then there are the French hone models supposedly constructed by Admiralty. Then there are the French bone models supposedly constructed by prisoriers of war in England during 1789-1799. There is a model of a royal barge in the time of the Georges, a model of the British warship Siren and models of the French privateer Volage and the frigate La Junon.

Despite objections of the New York Sabbath Day Society, through its attachment of the British warship Siren and the frigate La Junon.
